Marketing Text: T-SHARE seeks to promote and develop transcultural approach to cure in health care services, with particular attention to women's health and mental health. The goal is to help responding to emerging training needs in the sector, linked to the increase of users immigrants living in Europe and their demand for health care, prevention, but also of inclusion, participation and shared planning of health services. T-SHaRE develops methodologies and tools for the continuous learning and the recognition of competences learned in a non-formal and informal settings both for practitioners and for cultural mediators. T-SHaRE actively engages users, privileged witnesses, cultural mediators, researchers, practitioners and other professionals working in the field, both in the analysis of training needs of health services, and in the realization of pilot experiences to manage culturally-sensitive services addressed to women's health and mental health.

Summary: T-SHaRE project intends to define, enhance and recognize the expertise in cultural mediation in the health care sector in order to remove forms of exclusion, rejection or misunderstanding that often occur in health services, when the users have a hard time orienting themselves in a system of signs, interpretations and interventions that are too distant or disrespectful of their condition and culture. In particular, today the functions and responsibilities of the cultural mediator that operates in the area of care are not clearly defined or shared in the Member State and at the European level. This often creates misunderstandings with health care providers and physicians, which affect the intervention. This emerges with particularly urgency in the complex and delicate area of women's health and mental health, where the health dimension is closely related with the social, cultural, relational, legal and economic dimension. Furthermore, immigrants in the EU territory are not only users of health services, but sometimes they bring knowledge, practices, cultural representations of illness, health, medical practices, relationships help, which potentially represent an opportunity for innovation and improvement of European health models for all citizens. T-SHaRE will then bring out diverse visions and practices in the field of health and care, with a view to make them talk. The main aims of the project is to study these problem and develop methodologies and tools for or the establishment and training of inter-professional and cross-cultural teams working in the healthcare service, and the recognition of competences learned in a non-formal and informal settings both for practitioners and for cultural mediators.
