13	Theres a huge difference between the way people present themselves on social networks like facebook. For instance in Germany you shouldnt upload a picture where you are sitting in a coffeeshop in Amsterdam, but i realized that especially the people from the Netherlands or from overseas like Southamerica dont mind about loading up pictures like that. Of course in here in the Netherlands there are different laws about this but it is still something what employers wouldnt appreciate i guess.	9/20/2012 10:26 AM

16	I have no such examples, mb only some religious aspects: for one country, for example, it is accpactable to publish the photos with nude people, for other - it is strictly forbidden. But I think that social media now creating very independent space without respect to countries, and social networks have their own rules of communication: if you are in it, you should take it into account.	9/19/2012 8:56 AM

24	The best example, in my opinion, is China's Renren where they prohibited access to broadly used social networks, like Facebook, so that they wouldn't share their opinions with other people. Eventually this didn't prohibit people to express their opinions openly and Renren is a great example of a social media applied to a country with a different culture than the commonly culture of the most western countries.	9/17/2012 11:26 AM

Some people in different countries are more open to talk whit foreign and stranger people from other countries, and they don't have problem whit social media.	9/11/2012 8:01 AM
39	While social media was primarily created for socialising, there has been an accelerated and advanced usage of this platform in developed countries when compared to less or undeveloped ones who are yet to grasp the dynamic and broad usage of the platform thus it is been underutilised	9/11/2012 4:49 AM

49	My experience of social media was mostly through Facebook. It's a great place where a bunch of people can communicate all together and it's the most used social media so if I need any information I can always get it and it takes very little time, usually. I don't know much about cultural differences when using social media however I noticed that American people take facebook "more seriously" than European. They share more on on this media, they write diaries etc. Whereas European use Facebook mostly to communicate and give information needed for others. When I was in Belgium (from Erasmus exchange) Facebook was a great source of information that was linking all Belgian and foreign students. If there was any event organized or any "to do" thing in terms of school, papers, document, I could always find that out on Facebook.	9/8/2012 2:49 AM

52	People use social media in a different way. Some use it for work, others to keep in touch with friends they left behind.	9/7/2012 6:21 AM
53	When we are talking about muslim countries like Iran, Iraq I think that we have some restriction to using this kind of media. Of course some countries in Asia have similar problem with government and restrictions I think. But of course this situation also depend from age group - young people want to communicate, talk with people from other countries, they are opening.	9/7/2012 5:08 AM
54	I only can find "cultural" differences between young and old in the behaviour to social media use.	9/7/2012 4:01 AM

61	Those media which are avialable widely around in each country mostly differ in lanugage they operate in, however you can observe cultural differences in comments or progfiles of people from different countries, in belgium usually everything was availabe in a few languages, nice structured and organized, while in poland its messy very often even though it is improving year after year. Also access to some of media is bounded with lots of red tape eg. poland, france while in belgium and czech rep. it was very easy to get acces and use the internet for example.	9/6/2012 12:16 PM
62	Of course there are different cultures and behaviours around the global. Therefore, it is normal to see cultural diversity and clash. For example language and believes which are considered to be the most important of cultural aspects, I myself I don't understand sometime what others post on my wall this is due to a language barrier or sometime people post something which are really against of my believe. But different people have different attitude, believes and behaviours as well as freedom of speech.	9/6/2012 6:40 AM

78	Social media is forbidden in some countries due to religious or political reasons i.e. in China, where the well-known Facebook is not used, and Chinese use RenRen instead. The same is valid for some countries dominated by Islam, where people are limited to what they can post and share on social media. Have been questioning myself whether my friends coming from these cultures/countries feel isolated in some way or whether they feel different from people from the Western countries.	8/28/2012 1:15 PM

84	no problems	8/26/2012 1:59 AM
85	I didnt realize any big cultural differences (maybe is because I communicate mostly with people from Europe). However Spanish people swear more, they dont care about the righth grammar and spelling. They generally are more unorganized.	8/25/2012 5:34 AM
86	I dont use social media.	8/23/2012 11:32 PM
87	i do not know	8/23/2012 4:59 AM
88	I have studied one year in Texas and so far I havent recognised any big differences in using the social networks between USA and Slovak/Czech Republic.	8/23/2012 4:31 AM
89	I do not have such experience.	8/20/2012 11:51 PM
90	We use social media for company presentation and we have good profesional experience. Through social media we have established cooperation with foreign customer in Serbia. But this was one case from a lot of. Mostly social networks are used for contacting the Czech and Slovak customers. So far I have not noticed any significant differences.	8/20/2012 12:36 PM
91	In Germany, university students have their own SoMes, but Facebook is becoming more and more common.	8/8/2012 8:03 AM
92	very satisfactory	7/30/2012 6:15 PM
93	For exemple Italians tend to post a lot of pictures online without really censoring them.	7/30/2012 12:03 PM
94	I mostly have experience of the use of social media of European or American people. It is quite similar to my culture. I have the image that Asians are more careful in their use of social media than Western cultures.	7/30/2012 10:59 AM
95	erasmus in helsinki, traveling by couchsurfing around the UE	7/30/2012 5:32 AM
96	African (Tanzanian) people use facebook chat just to say "hi" if they dont have anything else to say.. Finnish people always have something to say to you if they star a conversation..	7/27/2012 12:18 AM
97	I have friends and know friends who have friends on facebook who are French and they seem to use it in much the same way as we do.	7/26/2012 8:04 AM
98	I don't have a lot of experience with this activities but I think we have to be sure that our receiver will be good about our messages.	7/26/2012 2:37 AM
99	I DO NOT YET	7/24/2012 4:24 PM
100	In my experience the social media can not be used the same way in all countries. Some services may be the same but before posting, sharing or uploading anything online in different countries, we need to be aware of the legal issues, the behaviour of the people living in that country (some habitants may find an issue more offensive than others) and also the consequences of each action that is being uploaded online and being shared with millions of people in an instant	7/24/2012 2:38 PM
101	I think the differences are mostly related to different persons and can't label singular behaviours as cultural differences. I've seen difference between agegroups tough, young teenagers seem to be more eager to reveal their real name and face to people met in online, than older people past 30 years of age.	7/24/2012 10:37 AM
102	I have noticed clear differences on friending and picture posting policies, but not sure if cultural or personality-based.	7/24/2012 6:15 AM
103	No differences	7/23/2012 4:12 AM
104	The language written in social media isn't the exact language that you learn in school, there's lots of abbreviations so it can be hard to understand sometimes.	7/21/2012 3:35 AM
105	While some swear words are considered to be nasty and impolite to say/write when using social media in some countries, they are considered to be a part of daily-life conversation in other countries. i.e. they are commonly used in these countries.	7/19/2012 10:27 PM
106	I'm currently studying in Germany and find that people here are far more concerned with privacy than in the UK/Ireland. E.g. on Facebook a girl called Katharina Winter might use the name 'Ka Thi' as her full name instead of making her surname public to everyone. Germans tend to post less details about their personal lives. Many people don't even use facebook, which would be considered 'abnormal' within my age group back home. A lot of young Germans prefer to network face to face. I find the UK and Ireland (and the US) very similar in the way they use social media.	7/18/2012 4:57 PM
107	Foreign people are more bold and save their log in information so their work buddies can abuse them and they like it. (Kenya)	7/16/2012 1:40 PM
108	I have noticed that the ones who do not live in their home country use social media for connecting with their landmen and starting for example facebook groups only in the purpose be in touch with any people from the same country, for example a Finnish community in Vienna (Finnish celebrations, events..), Somalian community in Helsinki...	7/16/2012 11:32 AM

109	Have used tuenti, a Spanish social media site, from my experience it seems to be used in the same way as Facebook, perhaps more emphasis on instant messaging.	7/15/2012 7:00 AM
110	In China people are not allowed to use facebook unlike in many other countries. Governmet is restricting that.	7/13/2012 9:49 AM
111	Some nationalities post more things to their own wall/timeline and to others' walls/timelines on Facebook.	7/13/2012 3:20 AM
112	Some times it´s difficult, but you must "adapt" your self into world	7/13/2012 2:15 AM
113	In Iceland it's very same. We use e-mail all the time.	7/12/2012 10:53 AM
114	Different networks, and different behaviours. Particularly in Spain. A load more posting of photos with many more people tagged in them than are in the picture, a very myspace attitude to their network 'Tuenti'. But in terms of the behaviour you're looking at, nothing really. I havent seen any major differences.	7/12/2012 8:23 AM
115	freedom of speach in some countries is an obstacle to continue the usage of some social networks	7/12/2012 5:30 AM
116	Difficulties explaining the concept of facebook etc to friends in China. Language barriers when communicating with friends from other countries. Social media generally are extremely useful in developing language skills, cultural understanding etc.	7/12/2012 4:43 AM
117	I don't use social media.	7/12/2012 3:31 AM
118	I have no experience about the differences. Keeping in touch with people seems to be the thing in facebook and at least the people that i have as "friends" behave pretty much the same way as they do live. Personally I use social media to get and share information, I follow pages of interest and block "friends" that feed me spam, advertisement or just too much nonesence.	7/11/2012 1:24 PM
119	Now days social media in my opinion dont have so much cultural differences. Everybody learns the similar etiquette. Example now days no body asks if they can upload picture of you into social media. pre facebook times it was norm to ask before upload.	7/11/2012 2:13 AM
120	It's interesting to see comments in other languages, mainly when expressing feelings (when you want to express laughter, you have jejeje or jajaja, you can write LOL or ha ha ha, etc, depends on the culture/ language)	7/11/2012 1:53 AM
121	I don't have experiences of cultural differences.	7/10/2012 11:15 PM
122	There is no way to harmonize the society across the Europe due to the cultural differences. Even the young students are adaptable to cultural changes by the end of the day there is only one common language in all of the countries : money.	7/10/2012 10:40 PM
123	different countries are accepting of different things	7/10/2012 11:00 AM
124	-	7/10/2012 8:26 AM
125	I have a lot of friends in different countries,in different parts of the world. It is very important to respect and to show them that is true,that you respect their tradition culture and their religious tradition,due the reason that,the God is only one,the Architect of the Univers it is the same(only geographical and cultural aspects make the difference)	7/10/2012 8:14 AM
126	None.	7/10/2012 7:13 AM
127	None	7/10/2012 7:00 AM
128	I do not have any significant experiences when living in another country when using social media networks. (EU countries only). I believe that the questions asked in this survey are very biased to fit with what those organising the programme believe is necessary for their project. I am familiar with how EU projects work and I think this project runs the risk of being a waste of time if those running the project do not create questions that enable those to answer to provide genuine input and feedback.	7/10/2012 4:23 AM
129	I've noticed that people from different countries, mainly Mainland Europe, don't use their full names on social media sites like Facebook. Instead, they'll use abbreviations or a middle name in place of their surname. This seems to be something done more frequently elsewhere and not common in the UK which can lead to problems with certain careers.	7/10/2012 3:44 AM
130	different type of pictures and privacy	7/10/2012 3:23 AM
131	In other countries people don't use real names and photos	7/10/2012 2:57 AM
132	not many, I think there are better things you could concentrate on that would be more useful.	7/10/2012 2:33 AM
133	For example when talking to a foreiger in e.g. in Facebook you need to be a bit more caucious and aware of the cultural differences and understand mishaps. And think before say.	7/10/2012 2:07 AM
134	I have found language barriers can harm social media use, especially within organisations. For example if a company employs a non-native english speaker to post updates on a social media platform and doesn't post correctly it can make the business seem unprofessional	7/10/2012 1:50 AM
135	Here in Germany, a lot of people do not use their real name anywhere, but a lot of social media sites (especially facebook) are really cracking down to make this more difficult to do. I have since considered perhaps doing the same thing.	7/10/2012 1:21 AM

138	In France, people very rarely use their full name as their avatar	7/10/2012 1:12 AM
139	I do not have much foreign friends but from the few I have I have not seen much difference in the way they use social media. In some countries though, Twitter is more used than Facebook. When I am using social media abroad, I use it in the same way as I would at home.	7/7/2012 3:48 AM
140	You can communicate with the others and for example in Facebook we organise our meetings, special events and it is so important for all multicultural organisations and programs.	7/6/2012 2:49 AM
141	I have no experiences from using social media across different countries	7/5/2012 12:23 PM
142	-	7/5/2012 2:32 AM
143	With Facebook I found out that there are many aspects and many differences in other countries, for example, culture, education, politics. In the area of education there is a huge connection between countries (with scholarship programs: Erasmus) but at the same time they are keeping their individuality. Social Media helps us a lot in finding a job abroad or if we want to travel. We met people, learn more and more foreign languages and culture.	7/5/2012 12:36 AM
144	I've noticed that people from central Europe often do not use their real name in Facebook. They come from more densely populated countries than Finland and probably have faced more problems with social media and want to protect themselves.	7/3/2012 2:50 AM
145	On the southern Europe people are more open in social media in good and bad way. They are giving much more comments, even they are honest or not. In Finland people are commenting more less, but always just how they really think.	7/2/2012 1:11 AM
146	I've only used one social media everywhere. I have not changed my behavior on social media when I went to different countries. Offline I consider local customs but in the internet on social media I am always my own Finnish self. Those who don't mind my true personality are my friends in social media. I only accept people I have met as my friends in social media. I think it's good that you use your own avatar picture and your real name but people should have a choice whether to use them or not.	7/1/2012 10:22 PM

149	There was a special experience to study abroad for 4 months. I have met different cultures in the same place. Since I am that kind of person that loves to make new friends for me was really important to communicate with them.	7/1/2012 6:56 AM
150	It's an interesting experience! I am always glad to meet new people from other cultural areas!	6/30/2012 11:29 PM
151	I haven't really noticed any difference culturally, it's more an individual difference.	6/30/2012 8:28 AM
152	Nowadays, I can not find very big differences between young people that they are from different countries...	6/30/2012 4:09 AM
153	Not understanding all the used languages or not knowing all the holidays of the different countries.	6/30/2012 3:38 AM
154	I do not have any experience in this field.	6/30/2012 3:06 AM
155	In Nepal I saw how people don't have any understanding about dangers of internet. People put others' pictures in to the internet without asking permission, they put also own family photos etc. in Facebook and told really openly about their life in Facebook etc. Also people didn't seem to remember to sign out and just left their Facebook open in internet cafes. I was surprised to see that they also allowed internet users to put their own material: photos, writings, welcoming texts and pictures etc. on the front page of the computer in libraries. In Finland people generally know quite well the dangers of internet and try to protect their private life. It's not allowed to put any personal material to public computers such as computers in libraries or schools.	6/30/2012 2:00 AM
156	People from different countries use Facebook in different ways. For example in Vietnam Facebook is banned and my friend has to use it secretly without anyone knowing where she is and how she entered the page. Many people from the USA post pictures and practice small talk around them. I think that Finnish people talk more privately.	6/28/2012 6:53 AM
157	Strong religious/political point of views are being posted from time to time. Commenting and expressing one's ideologies are sometimes outspoken carelessly which might be offensive or inappropriate for others viewing the posts. Freedom of speech is still allowed (as it should be) on the internet so essentially the reader chooses to interpret the writing/post/pictures according to his/her way of thinking.	6/28/2012 3:36 AM
158	I haven't actually experienced cultural differences that much. I think people behave equally bad when it comes to internet - especially on comment forums. Those places can be terrible, no matter what nationalities are writing there.	6/28/2012 3:11 AM
159	In Vietnam, using Facebook is secretly being blocked by the government. However, many young people know how to circumvent this problem, and do use Facebook regularly. It's also a rather new thing there, so some people may not know what kind of information they should reveal about themselves on the internet. YouTube is also very popular in Vietnam for searching music, because people don't usually own any records.	6/28/2012 1:36 AM
160	For it was strange that Facebook is considered a network for more adult people in Spain and the majority of young people is using Tuenti.	6/28/2012 1:27 AM

181	I think there's not too much difference in that respect, at least amongst "younger" people. Most grow into the platform in a way and adapt the behavior that their "friends" use. However, there seems to be a tendency to post much more information in countries like the U.S. or the Southern European countries than in Germany.	6/26/2012 2:24 AM
182	My facebook is full of chinese, french, finnish, english and even spanish updates. I find it very nice that this modern world connects me to people around the world. I'm not friends with people that I don't know well.	6/25/2012 12:58 PM

184	To me does not make any difference.	6/25/2012 7:02 AM
185	-	6/25/2012 6:01 AM
186	I consider myself average in activity as a social media user (mostly facebook), and so far haven't noticed significant differences in use. Seems to be used for giving information and arranging meetings etc. both in Finland and here (South Korea), both among Korean and other exchange student friends.	6/25/2012 5:08 AM
187	The cultural difference was not so huge when comparing the use of social media in Finland and in the UK. One thing was, in Wales in the countryside, it was easier to handle things by talking straight to people-visiting staff or calling. Emailing was not the most efficient way to handle anything.	6/25/2012 4:19 AM
188	In other countries they use more Twitter than in Finland.	6/25/2012 4:15 AM
189	Social media is WAY overrated here in Western countries and Europe.... please, come up with some new channel... social media is so last year and students are completely TIRED of finding 'information' via any social media.	6/25/2012 1:35 AM
190	Its best to do it face to face...media helps only in the beginning	6/24/2012 9:49 PM
191	In UK I didn't find it any different than in Finland	6/24/2012 8:39 AM
192	Generally only good experiences. It's easy to reach friends abroad with social media. Sometimes some random people from other countries try to contact for example on Facebook, but I always ignore people who I don't know.	6/24/2012 3:32 AM
193	I have not noticed such thing. In my opinion people all around the world (or at least those in my friends' list) use it in the same way. I once noticed a German girl who does not use her whole name on facebook and when I asked her why she told me that's because of safety reasons. I have never thought about that before. I somehow feel safe, so far.	6/24/2012 3:07 AM

214	Facebook is an excellent base where to sent information about event for huge groups. Among exchange students, you can use fb groub even for finding mated to do homeworks with. Actually, the group is more important than an email list. The different nationalities, however, need to be considered when posting: Asians don't want to read anything that is told in very straight way. They may also tell that they are coming to an event but then never show up. And they use a lot of - , ; , , ;) and so on. Some muslims may end all the messages with "May the Allah be with you" or something like that. It feels a bit stange, because no other people from other religions end the messages with the blessing of the God or Shiva. Americans always seem to want to comment about everything. French start everything with "in fact". Brazilians want to publish a lot of pictures, as the Italians do, too. Asians' pictures are very cute. When somebody need something, it's enteresting to pay attentions, how they do it. Europeans seem to, well, just ask for it. Asians seem to apologize at first and then ask something in very polite way. Americans end everything with "thnx". Indians complain at first and ask then. So, the culture is behind the social media.	6/20/2012 3:24 PM
215	Privacy settings. Mine are more loose.	6/20/2012 11:37 AM

217	During my time in Mexico I noticed that the use of social media has a big effect on the society. The companies, universities and different organizations utilize social media a lot and they always have their own facebook and twitter accounts. A lot of PR and advertisement is done by social media. Normally if you google a restaurant or a shop etc. you will find their facebook account rather than their web page. This is not so common for example in Finland: you usually use the web page of the organization to search for info. Normal people also use for example facebook a lot but I didn't really like the way some of them were using it. For example they are more likely to publish all the pictures they have in their camera without any sensure so you can really find unpleasent surprises of yourself for example after a party. At least I do respect other people's privacy and don't publish everything I have. Also many people write whatever on their walls without understanding that their 700 friends are able to read it. Maybe it was lack of education, maybe they just didn't care.	6/20/2012 9:36 AM
218	In China there were huge amount of restrictions for social media usage but if you know it beforehand it is not a problem. My experiences from social media in Asian countries were a lot similar to ones we have in Finland.	6/20/2012 7:03 AM

222	People from different countries posting in different languages and confusing me what are they talking about Spaming in the US is normal but for EU, it is not popular.	6/20/2012 12:27 AM
223	As far as I know they used social media in Portugal exactly the same way as we do here in Finland.	6/19/2012 11:04 PM
224	I have more mutual contacts	6/19/2012 11:01 PM
225	--	6/19/2012 3:07 PM
226	In Portugal it was the same, they used facebook like in finland.	6/19/2012 12:42 PM
227	i studied in belgium, which was not that different from finland concerning social media	6/19/2012 11:51 AM
228	-	6/19/2012 8:28 AM
229	Privacy is viewed differently in different countries. E.g. Italians share everything and Finns are generally more privacy-oriented	6/19/2012 8:07 AM
230	I have not noticed any huge differences how people use and behave on social media. Highly religious people might not share as much information as other people.	6/19/2012 7:54 AM
231	-	6/19/2012 7:42 AM
232	I haven't had any issues or problems when interacting with people from other cultures through social media. There's no big difference compared to interacting with people from your own culture.	6/19/2012 7:41 AM
233	I haven't encountered significant differences.	6/19/2012 7:05 AM
234	Some friends of mine travelling/living in Asia told me that the use of Facebook for example, has been blocked in these countries completely.	6/19/2012 5:57 AM
235	I have not encountered any. I don't think social media is tied to any country or culture. For example, I have as many Facebook friends from the US as from Canada, Japan, Russia, and Finland, and they all use social media the same way.	6/19/2012 5:53 AM
236	Differences in spoken language, people can understand something differently in different cultures or can be misunderstood because e.g. english is not the person's primarily spoken language.	6/19/2012 4:12 AM
237	compared to finnish people other europeans tag and network more in general. also the privacy is not so highly appreciated than in Fin.	6/19/2012 4:11 AM
238	Didn't notice any differences, as the cultures between Finland snd Scotland are quite similar.	6/19/2012 3:56 AM
239	Don't have experienced any great differencies. Americans have thousands of "friends" in facebook.	6/19/2012 3:52 AM
240	Amount of personal information uploaded and also for daily amount of postings Complaining about school and work Not able to do do group works and group tasks on FB groups etc	6/19/2012 3:49 AM
241	No cultural differences noticed, only that less use of social media in Hungary than in Finland.	6/19/2012 3:46 AM
242	I haven't noticed significant cultural differences when using social media.	6/19/2012 2:57 AM
243	-	6/19/2012 1:52 AM
244	waws not allowed to use it in shanghai and dubai.	6/18/2012 8:11 PM
245	My Asian friends tend to use Facebook very actively - too actively for my taste. They have a lot of status updates, use a lot of applications, post a lot of photos etc.	6/18/2012 12:21 PM

P2T 2.0 Students' Questionnaire

#	Responses	Date
246	For exampe the italians add very many pictures and talk very much in the public sites on facebook, and i don't think the finnsosh people do.	6/18/2012 10:58 AM
247	Language use, non-verbal communication (if gestures are seen via for example webcam)	6/18/2012 8:52 AM
248	The use of social media is not so much country-specific, according to my experiences, as it is between different age and hobby groups and interest. I would say it's transnational rather than country-specific. However, in different areas of the world people do use different services, but I'd say it's more because of their social networks than country borders.	6/18/2012 5:53 AM
249	I used to work in France and I had to sign a contract stating that I would not use company's name on social network. all colleagues followed it and we didn't put the company as our employer on Facebook, even though they probably didn't check. I think people in South America tent to put more information about themselves on social media.	6/16/2012 11:50 AM
250	Except for small regional differences in terms of popularity of particular social networks (e.g. Xing in Germany and LinkedIn in Poland) and frequency of use determined mostly by smartphone/internet penetration rates. Social behavior on major platforms i.e. Facebook, Twitter, G+ is fairly homogeneous across countries, especially within EU.	6/11/2012 8:08 AM
251	I ussually have european people and i don't find there such big differences. Just few years ago it was like here we were using icq, the were using msn and so on. And what I notices is difference incompare to Indian people, sometimes they think too serious and it's nor always worth it to joke about staff like relationship, wedding,..	6/9/2012 12:46 AM
252	mixing of human races makes beautiful people	6/7/2012 9:56 PM
253	Joking might be problematic.	6/7/2012 3:31 PM
254	Niggas are eating water melons, women should stay in the kitchen and so on...	6/7/2012 2:59 PM
255	For example my chinese friend has never used Facebook before (because it is forbidden in China).	6/7/2012 2:02 PM
256	I don't think there are many differences	6/7/2012 1:41 PM
257	x	6/7/2012 8:54 AM
258	Sorry, but I have only positive experience	6/7/2012 7:05 AM
259	As I was studying abroad I can tell that I have created great sense of cultural differences. According to them I managed my behavior towards people from different background on social medias.	6/7/2012 5:25 AM
260	I haven't experienced anything like this so far, however I think that there are no special rules of using social media across the world. I think one should follow the basic rules (as etiquette rules), and be aware of the fact that these might differ in various countries.	6/7/2012 5:14 AM
261	I haven't noticed any differences.	6/7/2012 4:29 AM
262	Well, for example, in the Czech Republic people are used to using icq but not so much in Belgium or in France. In Belgium, students used mainly msn or yahoo messenger. However, with the emergence of Facebook it is no longer a problem. But who does not have Facebook abroad it is like he never existed!	6/7/2012 4:25 AM
263	no problem	6/7/2012 4:24 AM
264	i don't speak about	6/5/2012 6:54 AM
265	don't have much as I'm rather cautious about talking to such	6/5/2012 5:13 AM
266	The only difference I was able to experience is, that many people from eastern countries (Arabic lands, Korea, India) don't use social media that much. Only skype, MSN, almost no Facebook (even though they've got accounts). They don't have the need to share personal moments of their lives. Many people from abroad (and friends of mine) use social media mainly for education.	6/5/2012 4:48 AM
267	in russia they do not use facebook	6/5/2012 4:08 AM
268	everyone Likes (literally) something different, but the similarities among people from same country are obvious	6/5/2012 1:48 AM
269	kinda different sight of looking at posting pictures of my friends without their permission	6/5/2012 1:22 AM
270	My experience is about time of reply to a request or to a comment. I generally expect to have a reply to a request sent via SM or email by 24 hours; Instant messaging should be replied ASAP max after a couple of hrs after posting. My professional experience tells that also in critical tasks this expectation has not always been met by my recipients. This is very irritating expecially when the request is of medium-high priority, and it is told to the recipient that it is a priority.	6/1/2012 12:52 AM
271	On the contrary using social media and communicating with people abroad makes you realize that there are more common things across different countries than you expected.	5/31/2012 1:34 AM
272	Hosting people in real life through Couchsurfing. Keeping touch with other people I've met abroad via facebook. Getting news from around the word through twitter.	5/31/2012 1:22 AM
273	none	5/29/2012 1:55 AM
